

Elizabethan Naval Administration: Navy Records Society Publications 160

The Elizabethan navy was a formidable force that played a crucial role in protecting England from invasion and projecting its power abroad. The effective administration of this navy was essential to its success, and the Navy Records Society Publications 160 provides a wealth of primary source material that sheds light on this important aspect of Elizabethan history.

Organization of the Elizabethan Navy

The Elizabethan navy was divided into two main fleets: the Royal Navy and the Merchant Navy. The Royal Navy was a permanent force that was maintained by the Crown, while the Merchant Navy was a collection of privately owned ships that could be called upon to serve in times of war.

The Royal Navy was divided into three squadrons: the Vanguard, the Main Battle, and the Rearguard. Each squadron was commanded by an admiral, and the entire fleet was commanded by the Lord High Admiral.

The Merchant Navy was organized into companies, each of which was responsible for a specific region of the country. The companies were responsible for maintaining a certain number of ships that could be called upon to serve in the Royal Navy in times of war.

Personnel of the Elizabethan Navy

The Elizabethan navy was manned by a variety of personnel, including sailors, marines, and officers. Sailors were the backbone of the navy, and they were responsible for operating the ships and carrying out the orders of their officers. Marines were soldiers who were trained to fight on land, and they were often used to defend ships from attack. Officers were responsible for commanding the ships and crews, and they were typically drawn from the ranks of the nobility or gentry.

Operations of the Elizabethan Navy

The Elizabethan navy was used for a variety of purposes, including:

* Defending England from invasion * Projecting English power abroad *
Fighting pirates * Exploring new lands

The navy was also used to support the English merchant marine, and it played a key role in the development of England's overseas empire.

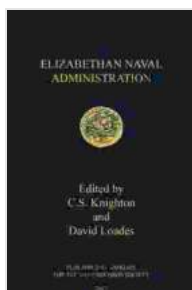

The Navy Records Society Publications 160

The Navy Records Society Publications 160 is a collection of primary source documents that provide a detailed look at the administration of the Elizabethan navy. The documents include:

* Letters from the Lord High Admiral to his subordinates * Orders from the Privy Council to the navy * Reports from naval officers * Muster rolls * Pay records * Shipbuilding contracts

These documents provide a wealth of information about the organization, personnel, and operations of the Elizabethan navy. They are an invaluable resource for scholars of maritime history, and they provide a fascinating glimpse into one of the most important institutions in English history.
