The Power of Place

Farrelly's work is deeply rooted in a sense of place. She is particularly drawn to the ways in which people interact with their environment, and she often uses her work to explore the complex relationships between people and place. In her series "Places and Faces," for example, Farrelly photographed people in their everyday surroundings, and she used these images to create a portrait of the community as a whole. The resulting work is a powerful and intimate portrayal of the people and places that make up a community.

The Construction of Identity

Farrelly's work is also a powerful exploration of the construction of identity. She is particularly interested in the ways in which we construct our sense of self through our interactions with others, and she often uses her work to explore the complex relationships between people. In her series "The Family Album," for example, Farrelly photographed her family members and friends, and she used these images to create a portrait of her own family history. The resulting work is a powerful and intimate portrayal of the people who have shaped Farrelly's life.

The Power of Memory

Farrelly's work also explores the power of memory. She is particularly interested in the ways in which we remember our past, and she often uses her work to explore the complex relationships between memory and identity. In her series "Memory Traces," for example, Farrelly used old photographs and other ephemera to create a portrait of her own past. The resulting work is a powerful and evocative exploration of the ways in which we remember our past, and it invites viewers to reflect on their own memories and experiences.
